

The FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's telephone privacy law protection. It has been wonderful not to be disturbed by unwanted phone calls at all hours of the day. I once received a telemarketing call at 1:00A.M., I had been asleep for several hours and the person on the other end of the telephone cared nothing about what time it was. At that time of the morning awaking to the phone ringing, you answer thinking something may have happened to a loved one, NOT expecting a rude person trying to sell you something. It has also been nice to enjoy an evening meal without unwanted calls. The privacy law that Indiana now uses is very effective and other friends that are on the no call list agree. When I'm looking to purchase items or needing home improvements or repairs, I refer to the phone book. Why would I trust a business that calls out of the blue? The news carries stories about businesses that are not reputable and prey on unsuspecting people quite a bit. It's bad enough receiving junk mail and junk e-mails. The world has enough advertising plastered everywhere, is it really necessary to lessen the privacy law?

Thank you for taking the time to find out what the view of general public.
